Mr. Chiang:

Kindly identify every third-party the infringing recording and composition was sent to, and the name and contact information of the uploader.

You also did not answer my previous question regarding why DK allowed the infringing track to be uploaded after notice.

Mr. Chiang:

Notice was served on DistroKid on behalf of my client, and by YouTube that this exact track infringed my client's rights. Your client elected to ignore that notice and redistribute the same infringing track (with a blurred cover are -- blurred because it was a picture of the original infringer Ninho) widely to YouTube, Spotify, Anghami, Amazon, TikTok, Deezer, Shazam, Last.Fm, Pandora, Apple Music, and iTunes, among other platforms.

DistroKid has directly infringed my client's rights, and is liable for the contributory infringement of each third-party infringer. DistroKid claimed it owned all or part of the copyright in the infringing upload on YouTube. Perhaps more troubling is the first upload of the infringing track to YouTube didn't include an artist name and identified Records DK as the label. DistroKid's actions were not that of a passive royalty collection service, it actively took actions that directly infringed and materially contributed to the infringement of others.

Kindly inform me by the end of the day today what actions DistroKid has taken regarding this matter. My client reserves all rights at law and in equity in this matter, and we will take the appropriate action after reviewing your response.
